From a religious organization, but the core curriculum is secular and appropriate to use in a classroom setting. Six sessions are good, but more would be better. Generally inclusive, but trans and non-binary folks need more representation. Could use more interactive activities. Many of these sessions are appropriate, but I would recommend also pulling from other curricula.

Love - All That and More is a faith-based curriculum that has options for secular, Christian, and Jewish lenses. The lessons are comprehensive and there's a terrific focus on the roots of sexual and dating violence, like gender expectations and unhealthy social norms. There were also lessons that were inclusive of LGBTQ folks, but no mention of trans people or gender identity - a gender binary was heavily reinforced throughout the curriculum. Some of the lessons were youth-centered, but the curriculum did not cover many current issues that youth face such as technology, social media, or hook-up culture. This curriculum in its secular format would be very appropriate for communities that are resistant or less ready for conversations about preventing child sexual abuse and dating violence, but I would encourage supplementing the lessons with another curriculum or additional material to create a more comprehensive prevention strategy.

Good material overall. However, I feel it is not differentiated enough to address ELL students or students that may require an IEP.
